Title: Crypto Tulip: This screen print depicts a tulip with a QR code pattern, visually conflating the famous Dutch tulip mania of the 1600s with the NFT and crypto currency movements of our modern global economy. Historical evidence illustrates the influence of emotion on economies, pointing to a need for regulation to prevent exploitation by a privileged minority. Striped tulips were referred to as "breakers", foreshadowing Facebook's ethos of "move fast and break things", which has ruled the Digital Age. "Crypto Tulip" is a small, varied screen print edition on pearlescent white paper. Each print has unique color gradients and brushstrokes.

Title: Clearfield Street Kite: I have moved many times and my concept of home is no longer a building. It has become a set of turbulent memories and relationships that I sometimes want to reel in, and at other times let go. By screen printing a house on a kite sail, I can act out and share feelings around my variable concept of home. I associate kites with mindfulness because they are designed to find balance in changing wind. "Clearfield Street Kite" is a flyable kite with a hand-drawn, screen-printed design depicting two-row homes in Port Richmond, Philadelphia. The kite is made of Tyvek, bamboo spars, and string, and comes with a plastic winder.
